2.2. Research areas

- His research focuses on the field of Business Administration, with particular emphasis on accounting, reporting, accountability and governance tools and practices.

- His main research approach is critical-interpretive, internationally widespread and known as "qualitative accounting" (or "critical/interpretive accounting"). This approach makes it possible to investigate these tools from both a technical perspective and in relation to the organisational and social implications associated with their use.

- The main research areas in which he has recently developed his publications, also with funding secured through competitive calls, may be summarised as follows:

  a) Sustainability reporting
  Research in this area examines the various forms of sustainability reporting (sustainability reports, integrated reports, etc.) as tools for explaining how sustainability issues are embedded within a holistic view of the organisation. Attention is paid to disclosure characteristics and to the impacts generated for stakeholders and at organisational and governance levels.

  b) The role of accounting and accountability systems in the governance of companies and institutions
  Research in this area explores the role of accounting and accountability systems in the exercise of governance prerogatives. Accounting systems are analysed as instruments of direction and power in the hands of those who hold governance responsibilities within companies and institutions.

  c) Accounting and governance from a historical perspective

Research in this area explores accounting and corporate governance issues from a historical perspective. It analyses how the relationship between accounting and governance has evolved over time to deepen understanding of their mutual influence in all types of organisations.

d) Corporate governance, risk management and value creation Research in this area explores how governance structures and/or corporate risk-management activities contribute to value-creation processes and shape stakeholders' exposure to risk.
