Why social innovation?

Social innovation research seeks to generate more sustainable and inclusive societies by connecting actors in different positions, organizations and milieus, in concerted efforts to respond to complex social issues. Social innovation is transdisciplinary, circulating and co-constructing knowledge across different disciplinary fields and involving non academic actors to generate solutions to emerging needs and problems.

Upskilling for digital social work

Some of the latest research projects focus on the impact of technology in redefining existing social issues and generating new ones. Data is being collected on the problems, but technology-assisted responses by social workers are still under-documented. In projects DICO II and DICO III, we explored the topic in contexts of outreach social work (human trafficking, addiction, homelessness, youth at risk, asylum seekers, etc) as well as in responses to gender violence by antiviolence centers.
